The hypercritical of course will not abstain from pointing out a few minor flaws. It will be said that the sculptor has not succeeded in hiding the embarrassment that the frock coat of Lincoin's day causes all sculptors. The two long lines of the open coat are indeed awkward, and the coat would certainly snap off were the status rolled down hill, a tast to which all good sculpture can be safely submitted, according to Michael Angelo.

Springfield will eventually have the figure in bronze; New York sees it only in the plaster, but it is not too mon to congratulate Springfield upon having obtained an unusually impressive "Lincoln." The work is dignified, serious

Mr. O'Connor's is a young Lincoln."

Mr. O'Connor's is a young Lincoln. That is, Lincoln is shown in his maturity, but the romance and poetry of the character are sounded rather than its ruggedness and profundities. It is inconceivable that the members of the Lincoln family would object to this Lincoln, even though the waistcoat be trumpled and the collar and cravat iff siting, for in Mr. O'Connor's hands the famous indifference of Lincoln to
